

Political leadership and political power. The origins, development, character, and practices of the leaders of American and other societies. Techniques for studying leadership.

AN OUTLINE OF TOPICS AND REQUIRED READINGS

Required readings are on reserve at the Main Library, or at the West Library (Political Science building). Besides preparing for class sessions and examinations by means of the readings, a student who wishes to take the course for 5 units is expected to write a paper. The paper will be a survey of the leadership of any contemporary or historical society, describing the group according to the framework established in the class sessions and readings. The student should seek to illustrate the principles used in class in the country, American state, or locality he has chosen to study. All papers are due in the office of the instructor by 4 p.m., March 8. It is suggested that the student select an area as soon as possible and read generally about the politics of the society concerned; then, as the framework of analysis develops in class, he may read more specific materials and begin his analysis. A midterm examination will be given at a time to be announced in class.
